. Shararat Abdurrahman Karim. A short summary of this paper. A short summary of this paper. In vivo studies of an amine oxidase activity in rat skin: direct histochemical detection of specific activities. A preliminary investigation into the histochemical identification of an amine oxidase activity in rat skin was conducted. Two histochemical methods were developed for the direct measurement of amine oxidase activity in the stratum corneum of the rat epidermis. The first involved the use of a cytochemical stain, 5-bromo-2'-deoxyuridine (BrdU), in conjunction with the histochemical detection of the amine oxidase activity. The second procedure involved the use of an o-dianisidine colorimetric assay. The results of this study indicated that there is an amine oxidase activity present in the epidermis, that can be detected using these histochemical methods, and that is not a byproduct of either BrdU staining or light microscopic procedures. The development of this type of assay may be useful in assessing the validity of any hypothesis relating to a possible physiological function for amine oxidase activity in the epidermis. I would like to know why is this happening and what is the correct way to perform it. Thanks in advance.
