Similar to humans, it is understood that children, adults, and older adults will likely have different goals and requirements regarding the design of an effective training and physical therapy device for use on sports participants to repair and rehabilitate their damaged or injured body parts. For example, adults may wish to train on a stationary device over a long period of time to develop the strength to continue rehabilitation and for extended periods of time, and they are unlikely to want to be in a seated position for long periods of time while using a device. On the other hand, children are less likely to want to remain stationary for long periods, and while children may have a relatively short session of training, they often like to participate in activities in addition to training. For training and physical therapy purposes, it is desirable for an athletic trainer to be able to properly position the body of the sports participant on the training device (e.g., a bench press machine) while monitoring a number of critical athlete characteristics (e.g., breathing, performance of the exercise, etc.). Most training devices have a number of movement limitations and/or movement feedback mechanisms which are often set in a manner that is somewhat fixed for each user. For example, some training devices rely on a complex user interface, which may be difficult and/or time-consuming to change. Also, some devices are set up to perform a single function (e.g., exercise machines, high-repetition exercise cycles) whereas others may be used to train the strength of multiple body parts (e.g., bench press machines, leg press machines). In addition, a user may desire to train in a standing or lateral position which is not conveniently provided by the majority of existing devices. It is also important for the trainer to be able to monitor athlete characteristics during training as well as to adjust and/or record the training parameters (e.g., number of repetitions, number of sets, weight changes, performance, time of duration, etc.). This allows for better communication between the trainer and the athlete during training. It also allows the trainer to adjust a training program based on how the athlete is progressing. It is also important for the training device to provide a moderate resistance training program. Unfortunately, many devices rely on significant manual human intervention to regulate the resistance, which may be unsuitable for some users. For example, training in a seated or lateral position using significant manual intervention may be very difficult or even impossible. Traditional stationary training devices use a number of sensors and mechanisms to measure a number
