We evaluated the safety and efficacy of percutaneous transluminal angioplasty (PTA) for coronary stenoses in the elderly. PTA is limited by the risk of restenosis and by the current lack of suitable equipment for arterial access. Although performed in the elderly, there has been little information about the safety and efficacy of PTA in this group of patients. Between April, 1984 and April, 1992, we performed PTA in 55 elderly (aged  $\geq 70$  years) patients at our institute; 34 of these patients had a normal coronary arteriogram at the time of the procedure. The 53 patients were followed up for a mean period of 11  $\pm$  8 months (range, 0 to 40 months). There were no periprocedural complications. Twenty-four patients died during follow-up: eight (26).
