Today, the news that the web-based version of Photoshop will become generally available to the public without requiring you to download Photoshop is something of a minor miracle in the world of graphic design. And with the release of the iPad version of Photoshop CC, it looks like this miracle is going to keep on going. We've all been looking forward to a web-based version of Photoshop ever since Photoshop Live first debuted in 2006. But we didn't think Adobe would make it happen. We thought Photoshop CC would be the last version of the desktop software. So we weren't really expecting this to happen. There's no doubt that the web is evolving. But it's easy to forget that the web is already here. It's already a major part of designing and executing branding, business, and art on iPhone and Android. And print is going through a transition: from being highly curated, with a staff of print-designers and a studio of presses to become a more open medium that anyone - with a little bit of skill and good design - can use. And the web is a central part of this transition. Add a Classic Viewport (a.k.a. Top Bar) so you can set text, and take advantage of the Shared Styles and Profiles. Everyone in your team can easily collaborate, and you can easily interact with designers from other areas in the Adobe ecosystem. And all of this comes with familiar assets: Import Camera Raw settings in the Lighting panel, and a new set of tools to track, rotate and adjust camera angles in a powerful, easy-to-use interface.
